

Schools push to offer 21st-century technology (excerpt)

By Jennifer Fenn Lefferts | GLOBE CORRESPONDENT OCTOBER 02, 2014

Milton has also faced funding challenges when it comes to adding technology, but received a big boost this year thanks to the Milton Foundation for Education, which raised money for new devices, said Michelle Kreuzer, vice principal of Milton High School.

Kreuzer said the high school is fully wired but does not have enough devices for every student. She said the district created a “digital learning team” that is looking at issues such as whether all students in every grade should have devices, and who should pay for them.

“The funding for it is hard,” she said. “At the high school, you want the devices in the students’ hands but it’s a huge commitment of money. It’s just figuring out how to get there and pay for the upkeep.” Read the entire article on BostonGlobe.com